In the best of times, reading the economic tea leaves can be very challenging but in today's pandemic-induced turbulence, we are in uncharted waters. The unprecedented loss of jobs, the number of business closings and the need for social distancing have caused the economy to head south. The Fed is predicting a 7.5% drop in Q2 GDP (30% annualized) with some hope for a rebound in Q3. Massive fiscal and monetary stimulus has mitigated the economic damage and the drop in reported infections and the anticipated introduction of a vaccine provide reason for optimism. There is also reason to believe that by this time next year, the Coronavirus will have been nearly vanquished and business activity will have rebounded due to pent up demand and a sea of liquidity.

Money Supply Jumps to $16.7 Trillion

The Fed has responded to the pandemic with multiple programs designed to provide massive liquidity to financial markets. With respect to liquidity, the graph on the left shows the M2 Money Supply through April 13, 2020. Due to Fed activity in March and April, M2 shot up by over $1 trillion which would portend increased economic activity. However, along with the increase in M2, the velocity of money (a measure of how fast dollars are being spent) dropped, pointing to the difficulty the Fed will have in inducing corporations and individuals to spend their way out of the downturn.
